Human Trafficking: The Role of Medicine in Interrupting the Cycle of Abuse and Violence

by Dr Wendy Macias-Konstantopoulos

Excerpts:

Human trafficking, a form of modern slavery, is an egregious violation of human rights with profound personal and public health implications. It includes forced labor and sexual exploitation of both U.S. and non-U.S. citizens and has been reported in all 50 states. Victims of human trafficking are currently among the most abused and disenfranchised persons in society, and they face a wide range of negative health outcomes resulting from their subjugation and exploitation.

With education and training, health care providers can recognize signs and symptoms of trafficking, provide trauma-informed care to this vulnerable population, and respond to exploited persons who are interested and ready to receive assistance. Multidisciplinary response protocols, research, and policy advocacy can enhance the impact of antitrafficking health care efforts to interrupt the cycle of abuse and violence for these victims.

Excerpts from: ENA Position Statement on Human trafficking in the Emergency Dept

Human Trafficking is a type of modern-day slavery, a significant global public health issue and the fastest growing criminal enterprise in the world.these victims of trafficking have limited access to healthcare and may only have a single encounter with healthcare professionals.....in fact, nurses may often be the only trusted individuals who can connect with trafficking victims.
